

Professional social workers provide essential services to individuals across the lifespan and have long been the workforce to guide people to critical resources, counsel them on important life decisions, and help them reach their full potential. Social workers are society's safety net, and with our current economic challenges, this safety net has grown to include and protect a diverse group of people from all walks of life. However, serious safety concerns, significant educational debt, and comparatively insufficient salaries are threatening the ability of our nation's social workers to provide these indispensable services. The Dorothy I. Height and Whitney M. Young, Jr. Social Work Reinvestment Act (S. 686) is designed to address these challenges to the profession, thereby helping to ensure that millions of individuals and families throughout the nation can continue to receive competent care. As an advocate of the social work profession, I am asking that you show your support for these professionals, as well as the constituents and communities you serve, by signing on as a cosponsor and actively working to ensure passage of this legislation. Contact Mona Shah in Senator Barbara Mikulski's office at (202) 224-4654.
